Dr. Mark Kenoyer is professor and chair of anthropology and director of the Center for South Asia at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. He has worked in both Pakistan and India since 1974, and has been excavating at Harappa, Pakistan, since 1986, with a focus is on the Indus Valley Civilization. He is especially interested in ancient technologies and crafts, socio-economic and political organization, and religion.

These interests have led him to study a broad range of cultural periods in South Asia as well as other regions of the world. His publications include monographs on the Indus civilization as well as numerous articles, a grade school book on ancient South Asia and even a coloring book on the Indus cities for children. He was guest curator with the Asia Society and a special consultant the Metropolitan Museum of Art.
